Hello again Stephen,

A thought struck me yesterday - would it be a win-win if I were to ask you to participate in the qualitative component of my survey?

Essentially, the work consists of the following. I'll give you access to a server that graphically compares the data I've received from two groups. One group was sourced by SG Analytics, and the other was sourced from NOGs. Both are anonymous but the former group's individuals are verified by SGA whereas the latter are purely anonymous.

You would then answer a series of questions (to the best of your capabilities), the object of which would be to assess the accuracy of the data.

To help understand the task better, I am going to interview two other people over a 45-minute duration, asking the same questions as I'd send you.

Does this make sense? If not, is there anything I can do to improve the offer?

Cheers,

Etienne

Hi Etienne:

Sorry (as usual) for the delay in responding. With OFC coming next week, things have been pretty hectic here.

How long do you think it would take me to go through the questions? I'm afraid I don't think I could spare 45 minutes.

Thanks,

Stephen

What about waiting until after OFC is over?

Would you be able to meet me and Mark Tinka online for 45 minutes for a discussion of the survey results?

I can offer payment for your time; in addition, your observations would be published in an academic journal (MDPI's Sustainability).

Cheers,

Etienne

Hi Stephen :)

I hope that OFC was a productive time for you.

Would you have a minute to share a thought on my proposal?

Cheers,

Etienne
